It is clearly evident by this simple review that Lightroom 5 succeeds in presenting an advanced user interface with a clean, tidy appearance. And this is maybe the most important reason why Lightroom 5 significantly turns the previous software around. There are literally about 100 different adjustments in Lightroom 5, and the new Camera Raw module, although not the main Lightroom component, still has a huge number of tools and effects to offer. The main change is that everything in the user interface is now much cleaner. Lightroom goes through its list of adjustments and effects slowly so the user can smoothly refine each one while making small alterations to the tone or colors. Lightroom does not have a huge number of tools and effects to offer. Indeed, there is no more Panorama tool. Lightroom 5 is not only going to turn itself upside down in terms of the interface design, it will also surprise you by adding new features and tools. It feels more like a serious camera RAW application than a photo management software. With Lightroom 5, Adobe makes a bid to attract photographers using post-processing features that are more akin to plugins in professional applications. And the way Lightroom 5 does this is by literally, on the hardware level. Lightroom 5 comes with a new Action Recorder, a new version of the Panorama tool, an improved Smart Preview toggle for fine-tuning your editing, a new Settings Dialog, a new Bridge panel, and it lets you create more keywords than with past versions. And when Lightroom 5 does come with a new feature, it's almost always a great one.
