When building a new home computer, it is imperative to choose a computer that is up to date with the latest computer technology. These days, computers are being upgraded rather frequently to keep pace with the advancements of technology. For example, tablets are becoming lighter and thinner, and the latest cell phones have more and more powerful processors, which means you should not settle for a computer that was released several years ago. After all, if you're going to upgrade not only your computer but also your office furniture, you'll probably have the computer for many years to come. If your computer is more than five years old or if you are planning to upgrade, you should consider upcycling your current computer. More and more people are turning to upcycling for their home computers. Upcycling is similar to recycling in the sense that you can turn an old computer into something that is new and useful. Compared with buying a new computer, upcycling your existing computer is more affordable and environmentally friendly. Moreover, upcycling involves minimal changes to the computer hardware, so you can still use it for years.

For those who have not yet joined the 3D revolution, it might be hard to understand the pain involved in creating 3D. Additionally, many professionals are becoming accustomed to using their image and graphics editing software to 3D workflows. This can mean the difference between a creative client's love affair with his or her 3D models and their demise. Adobe's latest acquisition of ILM and Pixologic means expanding the 3D workflow to include workers from other creative disciplines who want to shift their work flow to encompass 3D. Designers and other storytellers can now create and share 3D content seamless with Photoshop, enabling clients to consume the visions of their team members and editors with ease. A lot of professionals have been using a customized, file-based workflow just to build their 3D models. So the question is, "Is this state-of-the-art workflow going to be obsolete?" That's the question posed by the creative industry. With Photoshop's latest Java 3D support, designers who have relied on file-based 3D can now create 3D content seamlessly across Photoshop, CINEMA 4D, and the other stylizing applications that enable them to work restlessly in 3D. By offering native GPU-accelerated real-time video compositing, Adobe can now serve a near endless stream of fully-realized, user-customizable 3D worlds in the CINEMA 4D applications. It is now possible to create, edit, and tweak 3D content in a collaborative way. By updating CINEMA 4D to share the native GPU-accelerated compositing performance of the GPU with Photoshop, workflows are now greatly improved. Now designers can share 3D content in a multi-user, state-of-the-art fashion.
