in the mastering process, we mostly used the waves compass virtual mastering console and waves plugins plugin for adobe cs5. we used our waves plugins on the plugins, which was very helpful since the waves plugins plugin is cross-platform. we spent a lot of time on the mastering process. the fact that this album is a soundtrack to a movie gives it a more cinematic sound than previous albums. i recall we spent a lot of time on a complicated arpeggiated string part for family and it was a struggle with the instrument. for the most part this difficult string part was only heard in the timbres of strings. i also created quite a bit of automation during the mastering process. most of the pressure automation on her vocals was based on the use of comping patterns, which i had created. the sound engineer was quite basic in his approach to the recording, so we were very busy. i did most of the creative work by writing out the automation from scratch. luckily, by adding the tascam universal audio dsp, i can have the vocals on the blue track taken care of for me, and have the blacks from the blue track sent back to the bus to have different sends processed with the aux track so i can have the vocals process maybe a little brighter and then bring out the lows from the bus to the red track. then i just have the blue track send to the effect track, and its output is sent to a separate track on the bus called aux, and i use that as the track send for all my vocals. i would like to say that the blue and verb are on one of the bass frequencies, but for some reason that seems to kill the low end. this is the warm channel, so as long as the bass is working well, there will be no problems.
