expression and pharmacogenomics: comparisons of databases and collections of genes. Comparisons of sequence collection databases, gene expression data and genomic polymorphisms were carried out in order to compare the three approaches and their strengths and weaknesses. In three data collections, GenBank, UniGene and RefSeq, sequence data for codon usage as well as gene expression levels were analyzed. In addition, polymorphisms in coding and untranslated regions were obtained from the public databases. Only a third of all sequences from UniGene were found in GenBank and the order of the proportions of sequences in the three databases was different. In both expression databases, the number of genes significantly regulated by the drug thiopurine varied between 20 and 40% depending on the gene-annotation system used. About 40% of the polymorphisms in the coding sequence and 50% in the 3' UTR were found in the dbSNP database.

About 60% of the dbSNP changes did not pass the thresholds for declaring a change as non-silent or by chance. This study suggests that the gene-expression approaches are more suited than the coding sequence information for the prediction of the pharmacogenetic effect of a drug. A bill to ban partisan gerrymandering passed the House of Representatives today. The House has already passed legislation to create an independent redistricting commission that will draw lines by January 1, 2021. The bill is now headed to the Senate. The N.C. State Conference of the NAACP is concerned with what has happened since the law passed. "We were confident the bill would pass and it passed the House today, and at this time we are not concerned about the current delay,” said Adam Goodman, Associate Counsel for the NAACP’s North Carolina State Conference. “We continue to believe that the courts have the obligation and have the authority to provide this relief that will restore our right to vote
