This article focuses on how this brings FIFA closer to games like Madden NFL. The Road to FIFA 22 EA Sports has been playing around with the idea of using player motion capture in FIFA for a while now. Its been developing prototype systems for FIFA 1 through FIFA 21, showing a lot of promise and even resulting in a few pieces of footage that shows gameplay made from that data in FIFA 21. But you need to see things in motion to truly understand how it works. So when EA Sports made its announcement that FIFA 22 would feature Motion and Motion Analysis technology, we were all very excited. But when FIFA 22 was released a few days ago, many were pretty disappointed at the results. So how does all this work in FIFA 22? And what can fans expect from FIFA 23 and beyond? Let's take a closer look. How does it work? Firstly, let's start with the basics. FIFA 22 is the first FIFA game to include player motion capture data, but it's not the first time FIFA has had player tracking in FIFA. Player tracking in FIFA 1 through FIFA 18 uses a number of on-field sensors and camera/player-tracking software that, in theory, allows players to be tracked as they move around the pitch. The sensors and software then record player position data which can be used for on-field graphics and motion analysis. In FIFA 22, EA Sports has been able to take the next step towards player motion capture by using player motion capture data that is collected off the pitch and then importing it into the game. This goes further in improving the motion analysis that can then be incorporated into the gameplay engine. What does it mean for gameplay? So now we're getting to the meat of the article. The end goal of any new development in FIFA is to make a game that looks more realistic and feels more intuitive. But getting to a more realistic gameplay experience means incorporating data. Here are just a few of the ways that FIFA 22 brings us closer to being able to play like we do in Madden NFL, using motion and data collected off the pitch. The way players moves, how they react to defenders, how they change positions, how they position themselves in a match. All of these aspects are part of player motion capture and data and are now being used to make the game more intuitive and realistic. And it's all made possible

Take on the world in a unique way with FIFA Ultimate Team. Start by purchasing players and managers directly from a player data system, choosing formations and managing all aspects of your team. Build your dream side in the FIFA Ultimate Team Manager app. Or compete and play against the world as you dominate FIFA Ultimate Team on the pitch. As you win, earn the chance to set your own prices for cards you want to sell, and decide what others pay. Misc - -Player moves: Create and modify player moves to create your perfect team. Even better, use the career mode to create a player and see what happens. -FIFA World Cup 2018: Experience the warmth of the U.K. and the athleticism of South America in a different way. -Dynamic Player Ratings: Your friends are more accurate. I am trying to get input from a while loop based on user input. The problem is that the same user input is being entered twice. Why is this happening? I tried putting in 2 loops and using a while loop, it still doesn't work. Also, the if statement can't access the null so the while loops don't end. You need to check if the input is the same From: while(!isuser) To: while(!isuser) || (getline(cin, &input) == 'y') You have a few other problems too, so make sure you do some research before posting (link to a tutorial, a code example, etc.) If you want to use getline then you have to have the == sign in the brackets Hm, I just tested this script with a couple of friends. It works fine, even for a simple integer input. The best thing I can guess is that your while statement is outside of the while statement, which would mean it would never execute a second time. @adam9725721 you're right. I get the input but then it won't recognize the next input as valid and keep putting in a second user input. @FlameFox if you can please give me some insight as to how it works too. I understand the concept of if statements and how loops work, but I haven't found a whole lot of tutorials that explains it.Q: want to get the date in dd-mm-yyyy format how can i get the date in this format? i m getting date and
