‘Scotland is 5,000 miles long, and a week can change the way you look at it.’ – Douglas Hyde, Irish Poet and Statesman

The West Highland Line is well known in Scotland as the friend of the locals and visitor alike. The line, which stretches through some of the most picturesque scenery in the UK, runs as a heavily used and scenic line, connecting Fort William and Glasgow. This is the route that is featured in Train Simulator X, a game which emulates the authentic feel of the scenery and the railway's history. The line was built by the West Highland Railway and opened in 1894, giving Fort William a vital link to Glasgow and the rest of the UK. Unlike other major railway routes, the West Highland Line was built to follow the contours of the terrain rather than having expensive large viaducts, giving the unique feel and stunning scenery that so many enjoy today. Starting at Helensburgh Upper Station above the River Clyde, the route follows the shore of Gare Loch, passing the closed stations at Rhu and Shandon, and the naval base at Faslane. The first traditional West Highland Railway station is at Garelochhead Station, before the line turns away from Loch Long for Glen Douglas, the first summit on the line; here, there is also a rail-served MOD munitions depot. From Arrochar and Tarbet Station, the line follows the famous Loch Lomond, crossing Creag an Ardain Viaduct, before starting the climb to Glen Falloch Summit. The following miles see the line ascend and descend the many summits found on the line, including Rannoch Moor and Corrour Summit, and passing through the UK's only snow shed at Cruach. From Corrour, the line starts its long descent towards Fort William, passing the Treig Dam and through Tulloch, the Monessie Gorge and Spean Bridge, before arriving in Fort William itself. Throughout the line's history there have only ever been three to four passenger trains per day from Glasgow to Fort William. South of Crianlarich, the number of trains increased when BR closed the Crianlarich to Stirling line in 1965 and rerouted the Glasgow to Oban trains over the West Highland Line south of Crianlarich. One of the more interesting passenger trains on the line is the through sleeper service from London. Originally starting from London King's Cross, it was

What's new in Tyrant's Blessing:

In early May, North American citizens awoke to the news that certain perennial night blooms have been discovered (see earlier post) turning the night sky orange. The name given to the plants was Malus floribunda, and there are only about 12 other sightings worldwide. The color of the leaves suggests that the plant was species-hopping from the wild apple (Malus domestica) to this apparently aggressive apple. Whatever is creating these unusual effects is believed to be a non-porous human hybrid of orange and yellow. Normally, field tests on these kinds of hybrid plants are conducted on a farmer's open fields or possibly on a university campus where they aren't likely to cause any havoc. But this one showed up on the east coast, and residents had a bit of a problem at first. They had never seen anything like it. The problem with this unusual phenomenon is that it's been happening for years. The scientific community soon learned that the phenomenon was being witnessed every year, but the timing for the color change is unknown. Residents of the towns along the coast found out one year earlier than they expected. Hypotheses have gone around, such as "it's a problem with the wind, or a problem in their water supply". Other suggestions have questioned the possible use of a substance to trigger the color change, but no substance has been indicated. What we do know is that it doesn't hurt the plant, and that this appearance of the pigment is unique. It looks like a plant species that normally appears in Europe. But nothing about Malus floribunda makes any sort of scientific sense. There is only one way to fly in places that resemble the end of the earth. Terraforming is the use of land to prevent space from being as barren of life as it had been when the earth was last inhabited by humans. Terraforming a planet is similar. However, it is the different kinds of life and creatures that inhabit the moon, mars, mars, the sun, and other places that require the intervention. So, why would we need to have home planets? Humanity lives in the biosphere- one of millions of such biospheres that inhabit the planet. Biospheres are systems organized to provide life for whatever bio-life exists. Any system that can successfully keep life alive over a finite period of time is on a biosphere. However

Free Tyrant's Blessing [Updated]

Included in Greenwater is a full, eight-hour experience; extensive depth of freedom as you explore a fully-transparent 3D Greenwater from every view, and interact with every object; and a global, web-based real-time map of the map of Greenwater, which you can share with other players. The direct player-to-player physical interaction of fully-resolved Greenwater – you can fall, the floor tiles collapse, you can twist your body through 180 degrees (you can do this even if your Vive controllers are attached), and you can reach out of the top of the view to grab or grapple objects and throw them about – makes Greenwater unique. With the promise of developer support for Greenwater continuing beyond its launch – including updates to the physics system, improved graphics, and so on – this title is certain to stay one of the best reasons to buy a Vive. And with the existence of other tetherless games like The Gallery and The Brookhaven Experiment, a game like Greenwater stands out as the best in its class. About 13XXL: 13XXL is a 3D platform adventure game playable on Vive, Oculus Rift,

Gear VR, PSVR, and Oculus Touch. It's influenced by the classic NES games Binding of Isaac and Contra and features unique controls and physics that guide you through a series of puzzle-like rooms in a procedurally-generated dungeon. There's a lot of awesome in every room of the dungeon, but it's your job to find out what it all means. Buttons, face buttons, and touch have been replaced with a single force-feedback button that lets you glide, pull, and push the world around you, but it's our other, sixth sense that you must utilize to solve every puzzle. With our enhanced sense of awareness, we can interact with the world in new ways; hearken back to the very beginnings of interaction in gaming with Rift and Vive. Play with and against all your friends, and explore a fantastic reality inspired by the best of games of yore. We've teamed up with Huang Wenning – pioneer of the VR space, artist, writer, and creator of formosasoftware. We'll have a lot of exciting announcements to come in the coming months, but for now, enjoy the teaser trailer above!
